About This Book

The photographs in this book were digitized from glass negatives and original prints in the Chicago Tribune's archives. Many of these photos have never been published in any form. Throughout the book, regular text denotes original material taken from the Tribune's archives. Italic text denotes material created to connect the various source materials into a coherent whole.

Introduction

The images of Al Capone in this book were digitized from glass-plate negatives and original prints made from glass plates. These plates had been stored for decades in the deepest of basement storage rooms at the Tribune Tower, five levels below Michigan Avenue street level. Protected in paper envelopes, the plates were filed haphazardly. They were only recently located and brought up to the newsroom for scanning.

We had located buried treasure. Despite some degrading of the emulsion around the edges, most were in remarkably good shape. Because of the size of the plates, and the advancements in digital scanning, incredible detail can now be seen — spats, hats and smirks.

A small number of prints in folders filed in our old fourth-floor library were also scanned. Few of those images had been published before, but only once, and stored away in the stacks. The original glass plates associated with those prints have not been found, but the prints were so interesting and high quality that we included them in this collection. During Capone's lifetime, photographic techniques evolved from glass plates to 4-by-5 black-and-white film negatives. By the time Capone died in 1947, all of the photo coverage of his funeral was recorded on film.

The images were taken by photographers of the Chicago Tribune as well as the now-defunct Chicago Herald-Examiner and Chicago American. Those newspapers' archives folded into the Tribune archives when they went out of business.

Try to comprehend the difficulty of making glass-plate negatives in that era. News events were especially challenging — news photographers carried heavy Speed Graphic cameras that held 4-by-5-inch glass plates. Only one plate could be exposed at a time, so for every new photograph, another plate had to be loaded. Oftentimes the press photographers would shoot fewer than a dozen plates on assignment. Compare that with the hundreds of digital images typically taken by today's Chicago Tribune photojournalists on their daily assignments.

Some of these digitized glass-plate images have never been published. And when the unpublished plates were stored away at the Tower after being developed, perhaps only the photographer and certain editors had glanced at these “outtakes.” So it's our pleasure to share these visual documents of a criminal boss known around the world.

Al Capone's fingerprints.

Aug. 10, 1926: Capone and Attorney Benjamin Epstein.

November 1927: These men, all reputed enemies of Capone and Tony Lombardo, were held while Chicago police investigated a plot to kill members of a rival crime gang. From left are: Joseph Aiello, Joe Rubinelli, Michelo Bizirro, Jack Manzella, Joe Russo.

Dec. 30, 1927: Joliet Police Chief John Corcoran and the guns he confiscated from Capone and his gang when they got off the train in Joliet.

Al "Scarface" Capone.

Dec. 30, 1927: Capone after being charged with gun-toting by Joliet police.

Sept. 13, 1928: Capone in the crowd at Antonio “The Scourge” Lombardo’s funeral at Mount Carmel Cemetery in Hillside, a Chicago suburb. Lombardo, Capone’s adviser, was gunned down six days earlier at the intersection of Madison and Dearborn Streets in Chicago. (Purpose of arrows unknown.)

contempt of court as he exited the courtroom.

March 20, 1929: Crowd gathered outside the Chicago Federal Building waiting for Al Capone to exit after his first day of testimony before a federal grand jury.

February 1930: Home of Al Capone, 7244 South Prairie Ave., in the Park Manor neighborhood of Chicago.

Feb. 24, 1930: Another view of Al Capone's home.

March 24, 1930: The alley behind Al Capone's home.

1931: Al Capone's booking mug.

1931: Al Capone talks with the Chicago Cubs' Gabby Hartnett at Comiskey Park. Capone's son is seated between him and State Representative Roland Libonati. Behind Capone is "Machine Gun" Jack McGurn (face hidden) and two bodyguards.

April 1931: Federal agents seize and destroy one of 115 barrels of beer in raid on a brewery on South Wabash Avenue.
