Author's Note

SOME BOOKS WRITE THEMSELVES. The subject is so compelling that those connected with it are eager to talk and share experiences. I found this along the Seine, from Paul Lamarche at the source to Michel Lemoine at the mouth. To name them all would be to list the characters in the book, but I am grateful to each.

Specifically, my thanks to Jean-Pierre Ardouin, Jacques Donnez, Jillie Faraday, Annie Amirda, Charlie Godefroid, Olivier de Cornois, Frangoise and Jean-Robert Villepigue, Hazel Young, Eric Tempe, Phil Cousineau, Christine Guyot, Jean Allardi and, at the top of the list, the mysterious Philippe. Also, of course, thanks to the boating party: Jeannette Hermann, Gretchen Hoff, V Gardner, Dev Kernan, Jim Ravenscroft, Chuck McCutcheon, John Cooke, and Grabowski, wherever she is.

Amassing data and checking facts took a lot of help. For this, I thank Yota Milona, Alice Clark and Allison Penn.

Geri Thoma, pal and agent, persuaded me to put my passion for the Seine between covers. She solicited the interest of Bill Patrick, pal and editor, who made it happen. The reader will join me in thanking Patrick for his loving little remarks on margins of the initial manuscript: “weak,” “mundane,” “yuk!” and so forth. In the nature of things, authors are to publishers as mongeese are to serpents. Not so here. I am grateful to the whole house of Addison-Wesley for embracing this project from its first moments.

1 River of Light

EVERY OTHER MORNING, my friend Paul slouched into the office with yet another hard-luck story about the boat he loved. The something-something had clogged and frozen his family overnight. The bateau-mouche had decked his poop, or pooped his deck. The river had risen, and he needed a dinghy to get home.

Paul slouched because he was six feet one inch high, and the saloon ceiling of La Vieille was no Winter or summer, his clothes were ripe with mildew and diesel. One sleeting December night, his clothes smelled even worse. He had slipped on the gangway and belly flopped into the Seine.

Paul could talk your ear off about epoxy resin fatigue and wet carpets. He and his wife, Jill, had lived aboard La Vieille since the time they nursed her ancient teak timbers across the English Channel in 1967 and tied her up in the middle of Paris. That they had a son to rear on a fifty-four-foot boat didn't faze them, not even when young Ozzie grew so tall he could stand erect only with the hatch open.

During the decade that Paul and I worked together, I could never fathom his devotion to La Vieille. But I knew why he loved the Seine. There is not a river like it in the world, for beauty and passion along its banks. Its history is as old as the Jordan's, and it is no muddy stream across moonscape. Hardly a Mississippi, it still conceals treacherous sandbanks that keep boatmen anxiously marking their twain.

From the time I first gasped at the view from the Pont Marie, years ago, I was smitten by the Seine. And back then, I didn't know the half of it.

While Paul and Jill lived aboard La Vieille, I rented a country cottage four floors up in an old building in the heart of Paris, on the Ile Saint-Louis. Each time Paul lamented over his Webasto diesel heater, I thought of my cheery steam radiators and fireplaces on two floors. When winds and waves rocked the boat, I shut double doors to a terrace rose garden. I was a happy landlubber, and my clothes did not smell.

Late one night, I walked home across the Pont Sully. Golden light from the Quai d'Anjou glittered on the Seine. The narrow street curved by slate-roofed stone mansions that had sheltered the families from the Voltaires to the Rothschilds, who had made France into France. Climbing the last steps to my door, I figured I had found the loveliest speck of real estate in the world. With any luck, I'd live there forever.

Inside, I exulted on the subject to my friend and roommate. "We have to leave," she said.

It was a typical low Parisian story. A local reptile who inherited some money had heard about the apartment and visited our landlord. The short version of the story is that we had a few months to clear out, with no idea where to go. I only knew that I had to be near the Seine.

Paul showed up for work, as usual, with another La Vieille hard-luck story. "You don't want to see that old wreck, do you?" I asked. "I just might," he said. Not long after, I was the one telling the stories and reeking of old boat.

Paul and Jill had decided to move to England, and they were looking for friendly hands to take the helm. I was a reluctant candidate, a son of Arizona desert and a klutz with wrench or varnish brush. ~~took only one lunch on deck. The spring air was electric. Dutch barges lazed past, piloted by~~ housewives in slippers and patrolled by stubby dogs trained to coil rope with their teeth. Tugs puff by, their wakes sloshing the Burgundy in our glasses. On neighboring boats and along the quai, I watched characters Hugo had missed and Flaubert never imagined. Along with foul water, I saw waterfowl. It had to be Paris because the Eiffel Tower loomed over the golden cherubs on the Pont Alexandre IE. But we were also somewhere else, in a place most Parisians seldom see.

Only a few nylon ropes, a power cable and a garden hose connected us to the real world. Suddenly I understood why my friends loved La Vieille and had resolved to sell her with lumps in their throats. I had discovered the secret life of the Seine.

A glance at the river in Paris tells you what is going on in France. If it is not slopping over its stone quais at the new year, farmers had a bad time with drought. When it runs fast, high, and cocoa brown in April, the skiing was terrific-keepers had to drop the sluice gates on the Marne to drain off melting snow. When France is happiest, for a bicentennial celebration of the revolution or only Bastille Day, barges and barks jam the Seine on their way to the fireworks.

You can gauge the crop of tourists by counting heads hanging over the rails of bateaux-mouches. When barges are so heavy with gravel that water splashes over their gunwales, construction is booming. Seine watchers knew France was hooked on American television when the police began blasting past in hot little patrol boats, driver erect at the wheel, bound for lunch à la Miami Vice.

And downstream past Rouen, that glance at the Seine can tell you the state of the world. Long before most people got their lips around a new household word, perestroika, Jacques Mevel knew the curtain was coming down. A river pilot, he travels the world each day without leaving the Seine. He noticed that Soviet sea captains suddenly started smiling and talking to strangers.

From the beginning, the French soul has bobbed in the waters of the Seine. On its bridges, love blooms; beneath them, lives end. Hardly anyone can tell you exactly where the river starts, or much else about it, but it flows through every romantic's spirit. It nourished Maupassant's pen and watercolor. Monet's lily pond.

Paris was the City of Light long before there were switches to flip. The rayonnement, that radiance which the French have always beamed to the less enlightened, emanates from the pinks and oranges and sparkling flashes of the sun sinking into the Seine. When Baudelaire wrote that all around was nothing but "ordre et beauté; luxe, calme et volupté" he was looking at the river off the Ile Saint-Louis.

A few generations ago, Guillaume Apollinaire mused:

*Beneath the Pont Mirabeau flows the Seine
And our love . . .
While passes beneath the bridge of our arms
The eternal gaze of the sultry waves.*

But the river is not always as the poets would have it, voluptuous and unchanging. In late winter its mood shifts. When only slightly aroused, it floods the fast lanes along the Left Bank, gridlocking traffic from Saint-Michel to the Eiffel Tower. In 1910, hell-bent on mayhem, it went knee-deep into the fancy shops off the Champs-Élysées. A century ago, by the placid banks of a Normandy village the current swallowed Victor Hugo's daughter Léopoldine, who toppled from a boat and sank in her Sunday best.

For two thousand years, the Seine was alimentary canal to a nation that took its nourishment seriously. Grain moved upriver, passing cargoes of wine headed downstream. Most food travels by road and rail these days, but a look at the Seine suggests that it is still at least France's digestive tract. By the time it reaches Paris, the river carries enough detritus of civilization to sicken your average sewer rat. This, of course, does not deter the swimmers who race periodically from Notre-Dame toward Neuilly, emerging undissolved. The Seine will confound you every time.

Visitors have never gotten enough of the river. Gertrude Stein ran her dogs by the Seine. Hemingway Miller walked off his excesses along it; in a houseboat, Anai's Nin took hers to new levels. Fish was the first course of Hemingway's moveable feast; he loved to watch the anglers along the Pont des Arts footbridge: "It was easier to think . . . seeing people doing something they understood." The idea of Seine sushi is pretty revolting, but the old guys are still there in late spring when fishing is best.

Today's generation, if less lost than Hemingway's, still comes to the Seine in summer to shed inhibitions. Parisians strip down to nothing and sunbathe on its warm stone banks. They hide their wine in brown bags only when embarrassed by the label. On certain stretches of the quayside, Paris is gay. On others, kids and dogs frolic. Aging pigeon feeders occupy the benches by day, but lovers claim them at night.

Even its small mysteries intrigue. One evening a black wingtip shoe floated past my boat, down inside, sole flat on the surface. Enough Parisians insist they can walk on water; would one of them shortly stride past? My upstream neighbor, Pierre Richard, did well as the lead in a film called The Tall Blond Man with One Black Shoe. Who knows?

People mark their history with memories of the Seine. One night in 1958, my friend Jo Menck stood on the Pont-Neuf and watched mysterious loglike shapes bobbing by the dozen in the swift current. France was at war to keep Algeria under her wing, and the shapes were Algerians murdered by French zealots who countered terror in Algiers with terror in Paris. Bodies, as tradition demanded, were dumped in the river.

Politics changed, but the eternal waves flowed on. A few years after Jo stood on the Pont-Neuf, Algeria and most other French colonies went free, and people of two dozen cultures crowded into the métropole. By 1993, France decided it was no longer a land of asylum. On that same bridge, police stopped an African and demanded his papers for a routine identity check. He flung himself over the stone parapet and drowned in the Seine.

"The Seine is the great receptacle which first receives the victims of assassination or despair," wrote Fanny Trollope in 1836. "But they are not long permitted to elude the vigilance of the Parisian police; a huge net, stretched across the river at Saint-Cloud, receives and retains whatever the stream brings down; and anything that retains a trace of human form which is found amidst the product of the fearful draught is daily conveyed to La Morgue;—DAILY; for rarely does it chance that for four-and-twenty hours its melancholy biers remain unoccupied; often do eight, ten, a dozen corpses at a time arrive by the frightful caravan from 'les filets de Saint-Cloud.'"

These days, the number is down. During 1992, Paris police recovered thirteen bodies from the Seine. They rescued another twenty-three people who had fallen in, accidentally or on purpose. And they extracted nine cars. It was an average year.

The net at Saint-Cloud is also down. Today, God knows what would shred it, or fill it, in minutes. When the current is fast, huge trees are hurled downstream, like battering rams. Other items, small than trees and sometimes unspeakable, also float down the Seine. Here, for example, is a brief sampling from the log of a young visitor to La Vieille who watched for half an hour: one mattress, countless Styrofoam containers, a bloated pig, several condoms, dead fish, live ducks, a television set, someone's jacket, someone else's trousers, many people's lunch—at one stage or another.

American scientists have found fifty-seven varieties of pollution in the Seine. Those racing swimmers notwithstanding, it carries a hundred times more bacteria than the European Community safety level for swimming. In launching an ambitious campaign to clean up the river, Paris mayor Jacques Chirac announced that he would swim in it by 1994. The minister of health replied that he would be waiting on the bank with a towel and antibiotics. Chirac did not keep his promise.

Whatever Paris does, industries manage to elude measures to stop pollution. In 1991, Greenpeace blew the whistle. The group thrives in France under the slogan "You can't sink a Rainbow"—reference to the incident a few years back, in New Zealand, when French agents blasted a hole in the Greenpeace flagship, Rainbow Warrior, and killed a crewman. Most Frenchmen laughed it off; this was about polluting the Pacific. When it comes to the Seine, officialdom is more sympathetic. Greenpeace eco-warriors welded shut the waste pipes of some major offenders, choking them in their own poisonous sludge, and authorities began enforcing the law. Sort of.

Beyond industrial waste, there is the aging and overtaxed Paris sewage system. Even a little rain channels filth to the river. At times during the year, the largest tributary of the Seine is a river of noxious effluent from the Achères treatment plant.

Today the river balances on an ecological edge. Its fish feel the slightest rattle of the food chain. Early in June 1992, I came home from a trip to find the river running thick with bloated bream and carp cadavers. And I was seeing only the first few. Over three weeks, firemen scooped out a thousand tons of rotting fish along a twenty-five-mile stretch of the Seine. It seems the river was low, the water was warm, and an oily film cut the level of oxygen. Heat triggered a rash of bacteria, which ate up even more oxygen. A biblical deluge backed up the Paris sewers, pouring filth into the river. Half the fish in the Paris area died that week. Then again, half lived. Judging from the size of those that didn't, the river is alive with fish the size of small sheep.

Within weeks, high-tech barges were pumping billions of bubbles of oxygen into the river, and Parisians shrugged off the expense. Fortunately, the incident coincided with the Earth Summit in Rio de Janeiro. And this was, after all, the Seine.

Ichthyology aside, other species are endangered as modern times alter the course of the Seine. A whole class of freshwater salts, wharf rats, and river riders are also going. Like the fish, however, they are going slowly.

When I moved to the river, I found a cast of the old characters right off the end of my gangplan. Jean Privat looked after the quai at the Touring Club de France, where fifty converted barges and boats are settled in a floating community between the Pont de l'Alma and the footbridge just above the Pont de la Concorde. His job was to make sure nothing sank.

Winter and summer, he wore an increasingly off-white yachting cap and an American bomber jacket he picked up while working with U.S. forces in the war. A dashing figure, even when a liquid breakfast slurred his sentences, he always managed to have the last word. He spoke river, and urban mariners depended upon him for translation. When Jean died in 1990, he left in character. It was a busy day at the crematorium, and his family, having paid extra, refused to be shunted off to a chapel.

annex. The mortician was firm and so was the family, but Jean, of course, had the last word. The heavy caisson bearing his coffin suddenly rolled on its track—across the undertaker's toes.

After Jean's ashes were scattered on the water, his boat hook went to Jacques Donnez, who spells his name "Jack" (no one else does). Jacques looks like a cross between Jean-Paul Sartre and Popeye with a raspy voice and a craggy squint behind opaque glasses. At first, for me, he was mainly prime character material. Then I asked him to teach me to navigate. By the third time he spared me from making chopsticks of a fine old boat, he was Captain, sir, and a friend.

Jacques was born afloat in 1939, an eighth-generation Seine boatman. He and wife, Lisette, married on a floating church barge, made a decent income ferrying coal, sand, grain, and wine while their laundry flapped in the wind on the aft deck. But trucks and trains cut deeply into the market. In 1976, they sold the barge for scrap and came ashore. He took a job on the quai, where he can fix anything made by man and wait out anything delivered by nature. He starts early, works hard, and does his level best to help Burgundy vineyards prosper.

"Ouuuais, je l'aime," says Jacques, a man of few words, when asked to rhapsodize on the Seine. The trick is to watch him look at the river; his eyes are as expressive as temperature gauges. When he furrows his brow at the rising current, it is time to get your car off the quai. He is like most hearty of marine equipment, utterly dependable as long as you check the meters. When his nose flashes red, for example, it is not the time to have him change your bilge pump.

In no time at all, the river bewitched me. Most likely, it happened that July morning when I was wakened by a mother duck giving hell to eight fuzzy ducklings. With a fresh cup of coffee, I sat on deck to survey my new neighborhood. The Seine was calm but by 8 A.M. La Vieille was rocking gently like a cradle. The air bore a pleasant nip and fresh river scent. The bridge statues gleamed gold. Suddenly, sweet notes of music wafted down to the deck. Up in the trees, masked by leaves, I saw a bandsman in blue and red with shiny brass buttons tuning a French horn.

On balmy summer nights, we sat on deck until the Eiffel Tower blinked off at 1 A.M. Then we drank wine and giggled, forgetting to go to bed, until it was time for sunrise and the duck serenade.

Soon, I started talking funny. When I remarked to a normal person, "I've got dry rot in my head," he nodded in agreement, not aware that I was referring to the bathroom ceiling. At the time, the world was in turmoil, and my job as a reporter kept me nearer the Volga, the Vltava, and Victoria Falls. But every time I came home, the Seine had a new surprise. I decided I had to learn more about this magical river and the people who live on it.

The books lined up in La Vieille's saloon were of some help. Mostly, they confirmed a single bit of nautical knowledge: deck leaks make pages stick together. Within a year I had hired storage space for a library that would have capsized the boat: old musings in heavy leather, mildewed maps and slim volumes of verse. I spent afternoons gazing at paintings to see what had captivated the impressionists. I studied the river's moods, attuned to rising currents and falling barometers. With the help of Captain Jacques, I got La Vieille ready to roll, and we snooped into the river's innermost secrets. The more I realized that the depths were unfathomable, the more I loved the mission.

Looking around, I found the river's rich history bubbled regularly to the surface, refusing to die dead in books. One morning I returned to Paris to find a Viking longboat—gargoyles, oars and all—docked at the visitors' quai. This being the Seine, it would not have surprised me to find it full of hairy Norwegians in animal skins and pointy helmets looking for loot after a thousand-year time war.

It was a replica, part of an exhibition at the Grand Palais.

~~Since Roman times, the Seine was an Old World thoroughfare. Norsemen routinely plundered riverside abbeys and towns until Charles the Simple bought off King Rollo in 911 with a Spanish daughter and Normandy. The Vikings turned their energies into taming the river; their channels and dikes lasted ten centuries. On the Seine, William the Conqueror put together the flotilla that invaded England. He chased his cousins back to Scandinavia, and they have yet to return, except for Wimbledon.~~

Among the old stones of Paris are traces of walls built to repel the Vikings and remnants of late medieval forts that Napoléon III blasted away last century to let the river run free. By Notre-Dame, for instance, the Petit Pont has been around in one form or another since the birth of Christ. It was once flanked by wooden buildings, but they went in 1718, in a Parisian precursor to the Mrs. O'Leary cow incident. When things got lost in the Seine, back then, people went to a local convent for a hunk of bread blessed with a prayer to St. Nicolas. This, balanced on a plank along with a lighted candle, was placed in the river. Wherever the candle went out was the spot to look. A widow who lost her only son in the current launched a plank to find his body. The candle did not go out. It ignited a hay barge which struck the bridge, setting a three-day fire. Twenty-two houses burned to the pilings.

As the French went from monarchy to republic to empire to monarchy to empire to republic, the Seine remained their centerpiece. I had not only a river to explore but also a few thousand years of the soul of France.

The Seine that is synonymous with Paris is actually 482 miles long. In a straight line, it travels only 250 miles, but the Seine is in no hurry. It wells up from three cracks at the foot of a limestone hill in a forest glade in the Cote d'Or province of Burgundy, thirty miles northwest of Dijon. The Gauls, knowing magic when they saw it, built a temple at the source to the river goddess, Sequana, whose name was later smoothed out into Seine. Until the fourth century A.D., when German invaders destroyed the temple, pagan Perrier cured ancient ailments. A few believers remain convinced.

For the first mile or so, you can pop a cork across the Seine while déjeunering sur l'herbe. By the time it reaches Le Havre, after twenty-five locks in all, the river has broadened to an estuary hardly distinguishable from the English Channel beyond. From source to mouth, the Seine drops only sixteen hundred feet. At its widest, it can be dead calm, translucent in deep green hues. Or it can look like cau lait on the boil.

“La Seine” is sanctified by signboard on an old stone bridge in the village of Billy-lès-Chanceaux, eight miles from the source. The water beneath is crystal clear and hardly deep enough to drown a dwarf. It twists and turns, picking up the odd stream, until it reaches the bottom of Champagne country. By then, its banks are dotted with the remains of wooden wheels that once ground flour or cranked up a few watts of electricity.

Châtillon-sur-Seine is a miniature Paris, Seine-wise; its oldest part nestles between two branches of the river. But neither branch is wider than ten yards or more than a yard deep. Navigation starts at Marcilly, 120 miles from the source. River traffic once reached the medieval port at Troyes via canals, but the grand waterway ordered by Napoléon was closed less than a century after it opened, one more casualty of a vanishing way of life.

At Montereau, the Seine gets significant. The Yonne joins in, doubling the flow and adding traffic from canals and rivers that reach the Mediterranean. Farther on, at the impressionists' paradise of Moret, there is the Loing. Soon after, the Essonne. Then the Marne empties in, bringing water from the mountains of the Vosges and barges from beyond the Rhine, as far away as the Black Sea. The Seine is swift and murky and ready for Paris.

From the City of Light, the Seine winds into the heart of darkness. Past the abandoned hulk of the Renault factory on the He Séguin outside Paris, the riverside homes peter out. Suddenly, it is as if you are on Conrad's steamer among mangrove swamps on the Congo. And then, just as abruptly, the river turns and you sense the luminosity that inspired so many painters.

The Oise comes in below Paris, and the Eure and others. Long past the wrought-iron terrace of the Fournaise, where Renoir painted the luncheon clientele and Maupassant scribbled on the walls, the river passes near the village near Rouen where Flaubert's Emma Bovary learned home economics the hard way. Plaques along the way mark where battered Englishmen went home after their Hundred Years War and where, a long time later, the English helped run off Germans. A little tower marks the spot where Napoléon's ashes came ashore, for a carriage ride to Paris, after sailing up the Seine in a frigate painted black.

On a map of Normandy, Sequana looks like an earthworm with stomach cramps. The river snakes among spectacular castles and abbeys, set against a backdrop of plunging white escarpments and thick woods. In spring, its lazy loops are flanked in the shocking pink of cherry orchards. It changes again and again, meandering through history and humdrum, on toward open waters.

No statesman has missed the significance of this varied thoroughfare. "Le Havre, Rouen, and Paris are a single town," Napoléon said, "and the Seine is Main Street." He planned to build canals so that boats from lesser states to the east could visit the capital of Europe by inland waterway.

The Rhône, wild and wide, was once a Roman freeway. The Loire, lovely and long, winds among sumptuous chateaux. Next to either, the Seine is a stream. Its normal flow, four hundred cubic meters a second, is a fifth of the Rhône's and a sixth of the Danube's. But the Seine and its tributaries water an area totaling 78,878 square kilometers, 15 percent of France. Seventeen million inhabitants, a third of the French population, live within its reach. More than half of France's heavy industry, 60 percent of the phosphoric acid plants, 37 percent of the petroleum works, and a pair of nuclear reactors flank the greater Seine. The port of Paris handles twenty-six million tons of freight a year, equal to a million truckloads.

With all that, the people who live and work on the Seine reject the geographers' term fleuve, the French word for a river that feeds into the sea. Instead, the Seine is la rivière, which is supposed to apply only to gentle inland waterways. Sequana was a lady, Seine people insist, and so is their river.

If you live on the Seine, you are constantly asked two questions: Isn't it damp? (The answer is yes) and Where do you get your croissants in the morning? (The answer is: At the bakery). Occasionally, some kindred spirit has a third: When are you going to die and leave this to me?

It is agreeable, as the French say, to take a candlelight cruise without leaving home. You can get away for a weekend and not pack. Your morning alarm is those ducks quacking. Friends visit without coaxing. My pal Barbara Gerber fled a Stockholm winter and dropped into the nearest deck chair. When a bateau-mouche passed, she flung out her arms and yelled, "Envy me."

But there are drawbacks. A boat is not a great place for people who tend to drop their keys. When you're all dressed up with someplace to go, you don't want to crawl around your engines looking for car keys that slipped through the gearshift slot on the wheelhouse floor. Sleepwalkers, too, ought think twice. Life afloat is like living in a small apartment, in a zone of frequent, quiet earthquakes.

~~This key business can be serious. Once my friend Gretchen and I rented a van from a hole-in-the-wall agency just before it closed for an extended holiday weekend. The next morning, at 6 A.M., we assembled furniture and another couple for a long drive south. I put my briefcase on the deck table, placed the keys atop it, and went below for a final check. Gretchen, meanwhile, was loading the last of the stuff. She called down through the hatch: "Was there something on your bag that might have gone missing? It clinked on the deck and splashed in the water?"~~

For half an hour, we fumed like furnace flues, cursing fate. Then we quietly pleaded for a miracle, and one happened. Double-checking, I found that I had stupidly hung the van keys on the hook where my car keys should be. The Seine had swallowed the keys to my Peugeot, and I had an extra set of keys. Those. One is not always that lucky.

Jilly Faraday, a neighbor, dropped her key ring into the Seine: boat, car, the works. She called the *pompier*s, the river firemen who get bored waiting for real disaster. A frogman poked in the mud fifteen feet underwater. He found the keys.

Boats are also not the best places to teach an old cat new tricks. The lesson was made manifest in 1992 when a Marin County cat took up residence aboard La Vieille. Already slightly embarrassed by her name, Princess the cat had a few adjustment problems, one of which was that she fell into the river. No one knew it until she jumped back through a porthole onto the bed, her fluffy long hair matted and stinking, and produced a plaintive meow.

She was on penicillin for two weeks. All we know for sure is that cats, when pressed, can do the backstroke as well as chin-ups, and that Princess had run through eight and a half lives.

But then there is the secret life of the Seine, a separate arrondissement of the spirit. For years when I watched the Seine from above, I treasured the river as a lovely but inanimate path through the center of the most thrilling settlement I knew. It took moving onto it, having it seep into my bilge and turn my underwear green, for me to realize that it was alive, a settlement in its own right, people ruled by an elaborate class system of citizens who pledged allegiance to it.

Where else in Paris can you love thy neighbor? Late one night, I was washing dishes in the galley and heard someone bellowing my name. It was Olivier, who lives just aft, setting off in his little red boat with a load of nubile friends and his habitual shit-eating grin. They were off to the mysterious Île d'Amour upriver and around the bend, accessible only by water. He just wanted to wave good-bye. John D. Mac-Donald's character Travis McGee insists that the Alabama Tiger hosts the world's longest permanent floating party. He obviously does not know Olivier.

Close to the madding crowd, Paris wakes to fumes, snarls, bent fenders and coffee splashing on silk ties. Olivier de Cornois, however, grins so wide you'd think he was crazed except for that glimmer which suggests he knows why he is smiling. "Ahhhh," he says each morning to anyone close enough to hear, breathing deeply and showing an extra molar on either side of his grin, "the river."

Scion to a sugar-aristocracy family from Picardy, Olivier fell for the river in 1970. "J'ai flashé" he puts it. He'd been living in an apartment on the Rue Vavin in Montparnasse, studying drama, and fighting with his neighbors over loud parties; it is not clear whether the parties were theirs or his. But one night he went to a small orgy on a large boat and never looked back.

"My life has been paradise ever since," he told me one morning, grinning that grin which suggests Captain Blood on the way to bury doubloons. He lives on a red runabout that bobs like a cork in dishwasher anytime something serious churns past. He paints for the few odd francs, but lives essentially, on nothing. The Seine is his only love, except perhaps for women of tender age, and for riding his motorbike while standing up on the seat.

Olivier is tall and spare, with a rugged, handsome face and a shag of curls. He yells endearments to passing women, the kind that get your arm broken in California, and a lot of the women seem to like it. One of them married him.

For a brief time, Olivier and his much-younger wife were a model of bourgeois bliss. They had a daughter and moved ashore. "You know, the bouncing, the tight space, it's not so good for an infant," he said at the time, as if trying to convince himself more than me. When I next saw him, his crazy grin had matured to a beatific beam. He explained to me how it felt to nurture a tiny girl, and his eyes watered.

A little later, a touch of rue flavored his smile. In his forties, he was finding it hard to boogie all night and change diapers in the morning. But he was trying. Then I went away for a long time and came back to find him living alone on the boat. He was almost the old Olivier again, up with a grin, a few turns around the quai standing up on the motorbike, and a sacred thoughtful hour on the park bench under the trees in the late afternoon. But not quite.

I asked no questions, but soon enough the news came. Olivier's baby had died. His wife was with her family. He was back to his first love, the Seine.

At the time, Olivier was tied up behind me, next to a steel-hulled péniche. This is a 126-foot barge, the standard French workhorse. Its master is Philippe, a perfect neighbor who was not wild about me writing this book. When I told him the title, he recoiled: "But if you write about it, it's not secret. Be sure to tell them about floods and leaks." I resolved to spare his privacy, just as anyone aboard La Vieille is schooled not to see into his uncurtained windows. In France you can do it.

"Please understand if I do not seem to see you when we look at each other," Philippe said when we first met. I loved him instantly. Two boats tied alongside are like Siamese twins, and I am not a Rotarian. Imagine the perils of proximity. You cannot get to my boat without walking across the bow of Philippe's. He can't leave the quai unless I go first.

Carefully, like a couple of porcupines sharing a den, we found a happy symbiosis. I don't sand my nails when he is sleeping in. He shrugs when I park my car on his hose during his shower. Every so often he comes aboard to dislodge debris about to tear off my port-side prop, a hazard I tend not to notice, and he mutters in English: "Unaware. Completely unaware."

You never know. The other Sunday, he emerged blearily at 5 P.M., unwound six feet of hung-over party victim, wandered below to get my guitar, and announced, in G, "I'm a little red rooster."

My neighbors began to settle along the quai in 1960s when few people lived on the Seine. By now the old-timers know the river's every mood and who sells the best rope and the cleanest fuel. Our barge has a rose garden worthy of Versailles.

Depending on the season, early morning on the quai produces a trickle of joggers—once Madonna and goons trotted by—or a few diehard lovers or a Dutch camper that sneaked through the gate. But you will always see Bernard, Captain Jacques's sidekick, and his burly German shepherd. Bernard will be in a greasy black seaman's cap and blue coveralls. The dog will be drooling.

Bernard was one of those clochards who live under the bridges, friendly trolls of a time-honored class of Parisian bums. In Boudou Saved from Drowning, a classic film about the river, Michel Simon plays a clochard who is saved from the Seine. Bernard, however, was saved by the Seine. One morning, Philippe gave him a few francs to clean up in front of his boat. Then another neighbor hired him, and so did someone else. Soon, Bernard had a steady job working for the port, and his bum day were behind him.

One of life's pleasures is a chat with Bernard as he leans on his broom or scratches his dog's ear. It's too bad I can understand only one in every ten words of his Gabby Hayes delivery.

A lot of characters along the river have only walk-on parts. Someone is always making a movie, modeling underwear or uncorking a primal scream. It seems that a section of the Seine is reserved for every proclivity, and our quai is for lovers. Mostly, old-fashioned pairs stroll past. But one particular bench in the trees is noted for world-championship brazen coupling.

When I moved in, we even had a neighborhood swimming hole. This was the Piscine Deligny, a clean-water pool by the Quai d'Orsay where women displayed their breast implants and men showed each other most of their private parts. It was the last survivor of the bateaux-bains, floating pleasure spots that the Germans banished in 1942 as navigational hazards and needless frippery. For a century and a half, Parisians hurried to the sheet-metal beach, frolicked in the water, and ate lunch under umbrellas.

One morning in 1993, an hour before its scheduled yearly safety inspection, the Piscine Déligny sank like a stone. It had rested on three floating tanks, like barge hulls, linked by cable. For no apparent reason, the one nearest shore filled with water. Firemen could not detach the other two before the weight of the first capsized them. Immediately, the rumors flew: mafiosi did it; insurance played a part; someone was disgruntled at something. Paris lost its favorite swimming spot but gained a major mystery.

As the lyricists have it, Paris makes love to the Seine. At least, the city embraces its waterways like nowhere else on earth. New York ignores two rivers. London turns its back on the Thames. Comparisons with Venice are more than hyperbole. The Canal Saint-Martin loops deep into the Right Bank, carrying barges past chestnut trees and dramatic old landmarks to the Ourcq and Saint-Denis canals. From these, you see a Paris that most Parisians would swear vanished decades ago. There is the hulking Grands Moulins de Paris, which made the flour for bread no one could match. And the Hotel du Nord, which gave its name to another film classic. When Arletty leaned from a bridge and rasped to Louis Jouvet, "Atmosphère, atmosphère . . .," Parisians cried a river. The city's Grand Canal, the Seine itself, winds among parks and fancy mansions you reach by crossing water.

Venetian waterways are public thoroughfares, but their edges are jealously guarded. Vaporetto carry gawkers past private landings and closed wooden doors. But you can get off a Parisian Bat-Obus at any stop and walk along like you own the quai. On the upper level, les bouquinistes offer best sellers from the 1930s and travelogues of Timbuktu from open-air stalls. Down below, you can converse amiably with corn-fed tourists off the bus or play AIDS roulette with the rough trade. You'll hear French and English and Japanese, but also Catalan and Lapp and Dari.

On the Ile Saint-Louis or the Ile de la Cité, you can walk by the river and peer into mysterious worlds when someone swings open any of those massive double doors. At 17 Quai d'Anjou, for instance, Baudelaire and the club des hashishins—a play on assassins—met to smoke dope and plot the discomfiture of stuffy citizens. Rilke and Wagner and Delacroix were regulars; Hugo took a few hits and dropped off to sleep. Balzac didn't inhale.

Today's bohemians still gravitate to the river. So do most other Parisians. If most moored boats are people's homes or cargo haulers, and you approach uninvited on pain of death, others are there to be visited. Floating restaurants offer everything from tempura to tacos. By Notre-Dame, the Metamorphosis has been transformed from a sand barge to an Italian-style magic theater.

Down any quai, you can let your imagination run wild. Ask a few questions, and people are likely to misinform you about neighbors they hardly know. They guess by default; etiquette frowns on the prying in any obvious manner. Also, affairs are seldom as they seem. The Doges' Venice was straightforward as a Boy Scout troop next to a Seine-side boat community. People on the river by and large treasure their status as characters.

Among the Seine's colorful cast is La Vieille, that cranky but lovable aging matron with whom I spent a rough first night when I moved onto the river in July 1987.

La Vieille was built from Burmese hardwood and English hardware at the turn of the century as an admiral's gig for the Royal Navy. Driven by a steam engine, she plowed her deep V-shaped hull into heavy seas as flag officers pottered about their fleets. Doubtless she had a rich, noble history: seamanship, rolling depth charges overboard at lurking U-boats, daring rescues in the North Sea, the Dunkirk evacuation—that sort of thing. Doubtless.

All I know is that after World War II, someone turned her into a motor yacht. She had a lot of new names. The first was Namouna. Another evoked a port in Andalusia, an arid stretch of Spain not unlike my home country in Arizona. One of her names, I was told, meant “freedom” in Arabic. This appealed to me. When you can unplug a few lines and head toward anywhere in the world you have the fuel to reach, Freedom is a pretty good name to have painted across your fantail. But I prefer the nickname La Vieille, like a lot of French terms, means whatever you want it to mean: the old bitch; your mother; or the woman you love.

The boat is fifty-four feet long and thirteen feet wide. Her hull of double teak planking over closely spaced ribs is solid as a mountainside. Deep below the wheelhouse lurk two BMC Commodore diesel engines, slightly modified versions of what powered London taxicabs in the 1950s. What used to be the engine room is a saloon, fitted out in mahogany cabinets and built-in benches. There is an aft cabin, a decent-sized galley and a head with a tiny tub, another cabin, and a fo'c'sle (“foxhole,” as one friend kept calling it).

My friends, Paul and Jill, found the old girl moldering in a boat yard on the River Dart in the mid-1960s. Their knowledge of water was limited to baths and whisky mix. Nonetheless, they pointed her toward France and steamed up the Seine. When Paul and Jill signed over the boat, I went on a trip to give them time to wrap up the eighteen years they had spent on board. They left quickly, and the boat remained empty for weeks while the sun blazed down, preparing my welcome.

At some point, La Vieille's deck had been laid in softwood planking, which was later covered with fiberglass sheets. This, I learned, is not such a great combination. If the air is humid, the decking swells and seals itself. When the sun bakes down, it dries out. Planks contract and fiberglass cracks unless someone regularly waters down the deck. That July, no one did.

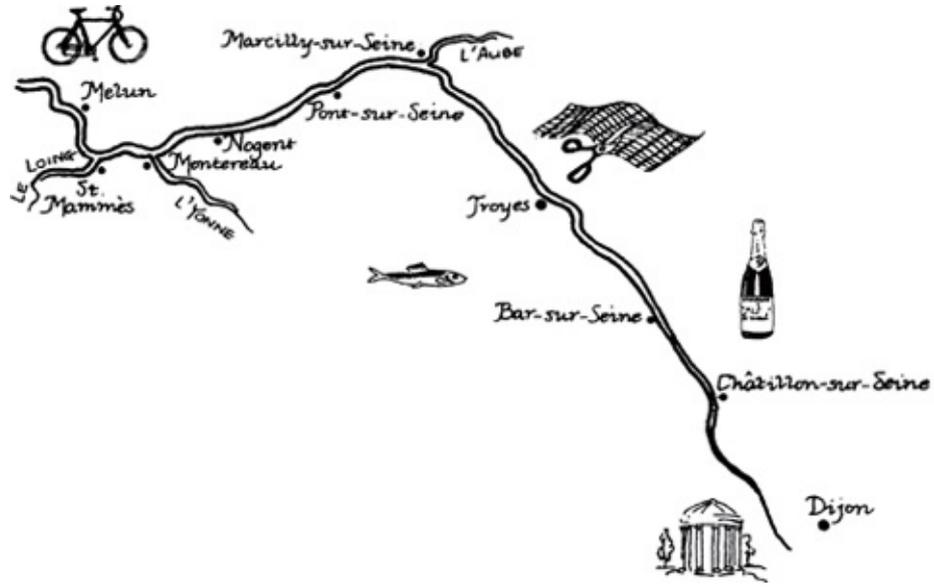

I went aboard in a raging downpour and found it raining nearly as hard belowdecks as it was on top. Deep cracks had opened everywhere. Fat drops splashed off the mahogany cabinets and the fancy folding table. The foam mattress was soaked in the aft cabin. All hatches leak a little; mine were streaming water.

Suddenly, I had a terrible thought: the deck would be leaking the length of the boat, pouring water into the bilge. I lifted the sodden carpet and pulled up a floorboard. The Seine was two inches below my feet. Like a maniac, I started to bail with a pot. Calming down, I pondered a call to the *pompier*s, noble crew with sturdy pumps. Instead, I switched on both bilge pumps and waited. The level slowly dropped. I found a small dry patch, curled into a ball and slept until the rain stopped.

In the morning, I found the gift that Paul and Jill had left playfully behind. It was a huge wooden carving of the up-yours finger, yet one more treasure they had plucked from the Seine.

2 The Source

PAUL LAMARCHE, keeper of the Seine, scampered over the last traces of a vast Gallo-Roman temple to show me the river's source. He was into his nineties, quick, sturdy, with an elfin twinkle in his eyes. Those old guys in Armenia last long on yogurt, but Lamarche thrives on the magical waters of the Seine.

"Look at this," Lamarche said, bending over a tiny stream trickling down a groove in the rock. He dislodged a stone and seized a waterbug, like a minuscule shrimp. "Any kind of pollution kills the things," he explained. "You won't find any cleaner water." He cupped his hands in the furry green moss and thrust his face into the cool liquid. I did the same. Water never tasted better.

The old man fell silent to let me ponder the past. Instead, my mind flashed ahead to the immediate future. I could imagine splashing water into guests' whisky aboard La Vieille and mentioning casually that I had scooped it from the Seine. A sadist's dream.

We were on the Langres Plateau in the Cote d'Or, up to our ankles in red poppies and talking over the buzzing hum of cicadas. Wild roses and columbines fringed the rocks, and rich, fragrant grass hid little yellow buds. Lamarche first saw this enchanted source when he was six. "We hiked down from Chanceaux to say bonjour to the goddess," he said, nodding toward a Rubenesque statue in a fairy grotto built by the city of Paris to honor Sequana.

The plaque says she was put there by Napoléon III, but Paul knows the statue was replaced in 1928. Once water spouted from her left arm, as though she were personally filling the river, but in decades years the pressure was not strong enough. Now water burbles ignobly from somewhere near her feet. In any case, her cave is not the actual source.

"The river really starts here," Lamarche said, pointing to a rusty grate by a few chunks of marble column, all that remains of the biggest temple in ancient Gaul. "And there and there." Water oozed from two other breaks in the rock at the base of a low cliff, in a clump of trees. "Then it goes underground and loops around to the grotto."

He was enjoying himself, poking holes in the first few fibs the Seine's curators sought to perpetrate on the public. The river was his life, and Sequana his beloved ancestor. After checking out the world in the military, Lamarche came home to Saint-Germain-Source-Seine, the village nearby. In 1953, he settled into the old caretaker's farmhouse just below the grotto and opened the Café Sequana. His wife, Monique, made omelettes and strong coffee. At the source, Lamarche planted two willows under which picnickers can dangle their toes in cool water, and shaped the small park. With money left over, he built the first bridge over the Seine, a funny little miniature of the vaulted spans farther down.

These days, mostly, he and Monique tend their fields. The grotto is left open to the public and needs only a casual eye. But when anyone stops to ask, the old man seizes a fat iron key and shows off the real thing.

Lamarche took me to the gate and worked at the rusted padlock. For several minutes, he jiggled the key and muttered darkly. Finally, he worked it loose. My friend Jean-nette, meantime, simply walked past the locked gate; the fence had long since collapsed. Inside, Lamarche showed us a heavy slice of column that looters had tried to roll into a pickup. He had run them off. “They’ve taken everything,” he said, shaking his head at nonspecific sacrilege over the last two millennia.

The park belongs to Paris. After all these years, the source of the Seine, deep in the belly of Burgundy, is still a colony of the French capital. Napoléon III claimed it last century when such symbolism was pregnant with political import. Now, only a curiosity, the symbol still fits. When the river gets bigger, it is pushed around with Paris in mind. Downstream from Paris, it runs thick with urban waste.

Although Lamarche plants the flowers, trims the trees, and cleans up after slob, what he likes best is talking to visitors. He wants people to get Sequana’s story straight. Which is not so easy to do. The Dictionnaire Etymologique des Noms de Rivières et de Montagnes en France offers eleven lines on the name Seine. What they say, in brief, is that no one knows much. Next to a Ptolemaic name in characters my computer cannot approach (Sekoanas, in Roman letters), there is the Caesarian Sequana. This, via a string of variants used over the centuries, evolved into Seine. Squan, apparently, was a Gallic word meaning twisting, or tranquil, or both. The Romans added a few vowels. Late French settled on a single syllable.

An eighteen-inch-high statue of the goddess has survived in a museum at Dijon. She is in flowing Greco-Roman robes, standing in a boat with a bow shaped like the head of swan; in the swan’s mouth is a small round object, a pomegranate or a tennis ball. For myth spinners, it is a promising start.

Archeologists, in fact, have put together a detailed account of the daily goings-on at the temple to Sequana. Reading it, I half-suspected that some clumsy printer had substituted pages from a modern guide to Lourdes. The Gauls’ first temple was made of wood and clay earth, but Romans later hauled in enough slabs of marble and hewn stone for a vast religious complex. The waters trickled among high columns and past inner recesses reserved for holy business. Downstream, they widened into a pool where the masses took the cure.

Gauls, Romans and foreign tourists covered great distances, hobbling on foot or in fancy carriage. Priests received offerings in temple alcoves. Pilgrims sealed vows by pitching coins or jewelry into the water. Artisans fashioned replicas of limbs in need of curing, and they charged an arm and a leg. In bronze, wood, or soft rock, they depicted familiar-looking maladies—tumors, poxes and deformities—which the Seine was enlisted to heal. Souvenir stands sold kitschy statuettes; had transport been better, they might have come from Taiwan.

The temple thrived as a sacred health spa and also as a vacation getaway from a bustling Gallic Roman settlement downstream started by a tribe of Gauls, fishermen and water traders known as the Parisii. Par, in Celtic, means boat. By then, the Parisii’s capital on an island in the Seine, now the Île de la Cité, was rolling in resource. The settlement as well as the region near Sequana’s temple and the river that linked them, were at the crux of a new world taking shape.

About six centuries before Christ, and the Romans, the Greeks had found a more direct route to Britain than sailing by Gibraltar and up rough open seas. They needed English tin and copper to make bronze, buying it with Mediterranean wine. Greek traders followed the Rhône to the Saône until the river ran out of river. Crews humped their cargo overland to the headwaters of the Seine. From there, it was only water to the Thames. The Greeks enriched not only the entrepôt region of Vix, not far from the source, but also Gallic villages clustered along the river.

Germans, meantime, carted their heavy metals from Spain, in exchange for honey, amber and furs. That required crossing the Seine. Wagoners settled on the Parisii's village, where flat rocks on either bank flanked an island made of silt. For much of the year, horses could ford the river; it was twice as wide then as it is now and a whole lot shallower. When the water was high, Gauls ferried the wagons across, for a price.

The island was perfectly placed. Forests hemmed in the river basin, and bandits cruised the rutted roads. Anyone with a choice preferred the Seine—peaceful, dependable and free of muggers. And road convoys had to get over the river. Seven thousand strong, behind a stockade, the Parisii ran a bustling market and a mint that stamped gold coins. Politics were shaped by the watermen, the nautae, who ruled the wavelets until A.D. 52.

But after Rome conquered the British isles, Caesar realized he had to fuel his legionnaires there with home-grown olive oil. Like all other roads, he decided, the Seine would lead to Rome. His armies seized everything along the old Greek route. On their island redoubt, the Gauls fought back.

Caesar reported humbly: "Labienus exhorted his soldiers to remember their past bravery, the happiest combats, and to conduct themselves as if Caesar, who so often had led them to victory, were there in person." Romans routed the right flank, but the Parisii's general, Camulogenus, held the center. "All were encircled and massacred," Caesar wrote, adding that horsemen cut down those who fled. We have no Gallic version, but the battle was likely the origin of Parisian driving habits.

Having burned their town rather than leave it to Caesar, the Gauls started fresh on the island. On the river's left bank, a gleaming Roman city offered the usual colonial amenities: temples, baths, theater, aqueducts, and stone streets, along with a port. Stone pillars and wooden planks made up the first Petit Pont. Gauls ran their own port on the island. The whole place was called Lutetia, a name that lingers today on a fancy hotel facade and a hundred other places.

The Romans built a temple to Jupiter atop a shrine to a Gallic god; Notre-Dame, on the same spot, now blots out both deities. By then, the Gauls had joined the invaders they could not beat. The nautae offered a statue to honor the Roman god and continued their lucrative river traffic.

Late in the third century, France was rearranged by the muscular Teutonic tourism that got to be a habit. Franks swept southwest from the Rhine estuary. They eventually settled most of the country, hence the name France. But Burgundians from the central Rhine, tall Wagnerian blonds with a power problem, made straight for the Seine. In A.D. 276, they trashed Lutetia, burning the Roman sector. Failing to dislodge the Gauls from their island, they moved upstream and razed Sequana's temple.

A Seine biographer, Anthony Glyn, reckons the Germanic invaders smashed the temple because they did not like female deities. In fact, centuries later, a monk named Seigne (pronounced "Seine") was sainted and recruited as patron of the river, which explains those impressive church towers at Saint-Seine-l'Abbaye, a few miles toward Dijon on the other side of the hill from the source. But he didn't take; Sequana has eclipsed Saint Seigne, whatever his role.

The Roman Empire was crumbling fast. In Lutetia, Gallo-Romans had shaped a new culture. Freed of Mediterranean keepers, they took the old name, Paris. And they looked mostly downstream, toward England and northern Europe, where trade was brisk. Wine from Burgundy and Champagne floated down the Seine. But not much came from beyond, overland from the Saône. Gradually, Sequana's shrine lost its pre-Michelin stars and slipped into the mists.

I started my river journey on foot. This line might have carried some power in a Richard Burton diary.
